Video interviews for suspects among changes to criminal code passed by Parliament

One-stop command centre to manage building facilities the way to go: Desmond Lee

Video recordings will help court assess statements

LAWYER SUI YI SIONG, on an accused person challenging the voluntariness of a given statement.

This will enable more effective detection and prevention of terrorist threats, said the Ministry of Law. At the same time, a female officer may search a woman suspect of a criminal offense.

Video recording is expected to be introduced in phases, after the laws are passed, said the ministry.

Law enforcement officers will be able to decide, based on the suitability of a case, whether to take a statement in writing or via video recording.

Already, officers have been trained on the skills needed for video-recorded interviews, which would be made compulsory for certain categories of suspects of serious sexual offenses.

To prevent the videos from being leaked on the Internet or sold on the black market, several safe-

Defence lawyers will be able to view a video-recorded statement only at an approved place, such as a police station. The unauthorised copying, use or distribution of the video will also be an offence.

In 2015, the Ministry of Home Affairs announced the availability of video-recorded interviews with suspects in a pilot programme. But this did not take place, as the appropriate legislative framework was not yet in place.

Video-recordings of suspects' statements to start in phases

Selina Lums
Law Correspondent

The video-recording of statements from suspects will be introduced in three phases, starting with the interview of those accused of specified serious offences, senior Minister of State for Law and Justice (Rajah said yesterday).

The video-recording of such interviews is mandatory, she added, noting that enough police officers will have been trained to implement the first phase.

This new requirement is an increase that 500 three changes of the Criminal Justice system, since it is criminal by England and
